

A DOWN'S SYNDROME DESIGNER

WRITTEN BY: CAROLA CRESPO AND NURIA ALBANELL

The subject of the articles is that an Australian girl with Down Syndrome has launched her own fashion brand and she's a model of different other brands.

We chose these news because we think that including people with disabilities in the society can help them to feel more useful and happier with themselves, and it brings many positive aspects to our society.

One article is from an online magazine called "Reuters", and was published on the 13th February 2017. The title of the article is: "Model with Down syndrome launches design label at New York Fashion Week."

The other one is from the English newspaper "DailyMail" and was published the same date as the other one. The newspaper presents the article through the title: "Model with Down syndrome, Madeline Stuart, debuts her own edgy clothing line on the runway at New York Fashion Week." In both titles they remark that the girl has a disability and that she has triumphed.

The article of Reuters starts talking about other things that Madeline did years ago in the fashion world, and the one of DailyMail starts talking about her disability and how she has been introduced in the fashion industry.

In both newspapers, the article is very irrelevant, because it was very hard to find the piece of news and we spent a lot of time until we found it.

The news of DailyMail has lots of images that clarify the text that you're reading, but the one of Reuters only includes a pair of them. Regarding the subheadings, both of them explain the pictures.

In both newspapers, the articles are aimed at people of all ages and classes because it encourages people with handicaps.

The language of the articles is very simple, because, as we said before, it's aimed to all kind of people. The sentences are long, but they have connectors as comas, semicolons... also, they don't use specific words. The language isn't sensationalistic neither emotive, because it doesn't give the writer's opinion.

The tone of the article is just informative because the writers only want to make public that dreams can become true, and people with disabilities can do the same actions as people without them.

None of the articles are biased, because they don't show the opinion in any moment, and they have a balanced view of the situation. We feel sympathy for Madeline because we're never going to understand her situation, and for that reason, we feel empathy for her.

We prefer the article of DailyMail because it gives more information about the collection and her professional career. Also, it has more images so it's easier to understand better the meaning of the notice.

We hope that Madeline will continue working as hard as she had worked before, so she can reach her future objectives. Also, we hope that someday she will come to Spain so we can meet her and watch one of her runways.

Analyzed news:

<http://www.reuters.com/article/us-fashion-new-york-downsyndrome-idUSKBN15S056>

<http://www.dailymail.co.uk/femail/article-4218392/Madeline-Stuart-storms-runway-Ney-York-Fashion-Week.html>